SAT fixes ignore key flaws

A growing number of colleges have found a wiser solution to the SAT’s unfairness. More than 390 no longer require applicants to submit SAT scores. That’s up from 281 in 1998, according to FairTest, which opposes standardized tests. The list of schools includes such names as Mount Holyoke, Bowdoin, Bates and Muhlenberg.

These schools judge students on their entire high school careers, not one test. The College Board might think about that today as it considers tinkering with a test that so many schools find irrelevant.
